Wafi Al-Tal St Real Estate Development Complex Oxidative dissociation of S-adenosyl-L-homocysteine and the alpha, beta-lysyl radical resulting from the photolysis of S-adenosyl-L-methionine. Irradiation of S-adenosyl-L-methionine at $\lambda > \text{or } = 260 \text{ nm}$ leads to the alpha, beta-lysyl radical and to a stable ketyl-methionine-1-peroxide. The latter can be converted to ketyl-methionine and hydrogen peroxide. Photochemical oxidative dissociation of S-adenosyl-L-homocysteine [S-AdoHcy] at $\lambda > \text{or } = 275 \text{ nm}$ leads to alpha, beta-lysyl-homocysteine as the main product. The photolysis of S-AdoHcy at 325 nm is accompanied by the formation of alpha, beta-lysyl-methionine, whereas at 260 nm it gives both S-adenosyl-L-homocysteine and alpha, beta-lysyl-methionine. Communications application systems and computer systems, for example, generally require a reliable communications channel to exchange data. High reliability is needed in applications such as airline and railcar operations, for example, where most of the time a communications link is required. Traditionally, communications reliability has been achieved by locking the communications network to a given implementation or configuration and reconfiguring the network only when a problem has been identified. This method can be effective, but it can also be expensive. Many networks are built and modified over time; change management becomes a considerable burden for a network owner. A communications channel can include systems such as jacks, wires, or fiber-optic cables. The channel may support different numbers of communications pairs according to a desired communications standard. The connectivity of the communications channel can be fixed. Some systems, such as copper-wire-based (metallic) or fiber-optic-based systems, offer a certain degree of reconfigurability. In one approach, a communications network is built in a topology that is similar to a pre-designed system. In an alternative approach, the communications network is built in a topology that has flexibility. In either approach, however, the connectivity of the communications channel is fixed in the delivered configuration. Changing the connectivity of the communications
