I'm trying to figure out if I'm really understanding it. For my assignment, we are supposed to create a service layer, but I've been trying to understand how to implement the repository pattern. What I'd like to know is this: If I have a class, User, that has two properties, Name and Address, and I create the following class, Repository: `public UserRepository() { _user = new User() { _user.Name = "bla"; _user.Address = "asdf"; } }` What I want to know is, does this pattern enable me to operate off of the data, in this instance, _user in a similar way to an ORM (Object Relational Mapper) like NHibernate/Dapper? Is it only really useful if one is creating objects, like the object above, in a new manner, ie. using the repository? A: In terms of "unit of work" vs. "mapping" - you might be looking in the wrong place. What you are describing is a pattern, "View Model", named after the Domain Model. The Repository is, well, a repository. It's a layer of abstraction. Repositories encapsulate business logic. They do things like: query the database execute the query return the data to the caller There are many variations on these points. And of course, Repositories can themselves be built on top of other Repositories. Keep in mind that the term Repository is overloaded. It might be what you described above, or it might be something like DAL or another layer. A study of the effect of tissue culture on the flow pattern and creep of in vitro cooked bovine muscle. The extent of swelling of sarcoplasmic reticulum and the ease of its extraction during cooking influenced the effect of lengthening of muscle fibers on the flow pattern and creep of in vitro cooked muscles.
