The mycotoxin deoxynivalenol (DON) and T-2 toxin were analysed in bran and endosperm of unprocessed and chemically or thermally treated samples of barley seeds, and in silage, and in feed and silage residues, after feeding of the unprocessed seeds for 4 wk to dairy cows. The DON content was higher in the bran of the unprocessed seeds, and after fermentation in silage and in the feed, than in the endosperm. In the unfermented seeds, the DON content was higher in the endosperm than in the bran. The T-2 toxin content was higher in the bran than in the endosperm. After fermentation of the unfermented seeds, the DON content in the silage and silage residues increased by 110 and 4%, respectively. The T-2 toxin contents in the silage and silage residues decreased by 58 and 84%, respectively, after fermentation.Changes in the specificity of cytokeratin polypeptides during pleural mesothelioma development. The cytoskeleton comprises a highly complex network of intermediate filaments (IF) which have been implicated in the differentiation and regulation of a number of cellular processes. We have demonstrated previously that IF isolated from normal murine fibroblast cells lack expression of the type II IF polypeptide, pair of cytokeratins. We now report that cytokeratin (CK) expression in interphase nuclei is altered in cells transformed with a activated tyrosine kinase, simian virus 40 (SV40), and in cells isolated from pleural mesotheliomas. There is a reduction in the percentage of cells which express cytokeratin, including non-neoplastic cells, from control tissues to SV40 transformed cells, from control tissue
