MacRumors attracts a broad audience of both consumers and professionals interested in the latest technologies and products. We also boast an active community focused on purchasing decisions and technical aspects of the iPhone, iPod, iPad, and Mac platforms. Shopping malls, parking lots and other retail establishments often use video surveillance systems to prevent shoplifting and other crimes. These systems often include video surveillance cameras that are mounted to structural members to allow the cameras to view a large area. Unfortunately, mounting these cameras to structural members is time consuming and labor intensive. The video surveillance industry has recently developed systems that allow the use of a single camera to capture a large area and to transmit the video content of that area to a video server. The video server can then retrieve the video content from the single video camera in the video server for viewing by various users. Some video servers allow the video content to be stored on a video server to be remotely viewed by users at their convenience. These systems provide many advantages over conventional video surveillance systems. Unfortunately, the ability of video servers to retrieve video content from a single video camera limits the types of video content that can be captured by the video camera. For example, the video server can only retrieve video content in frames
