Gertrude Carnegie Gertrude Carnegie (1851–1887) was an English-born Australian suffragist and women's rights activist. Life Gertrude Carnegie was born in 1851 in England, the daughter of William Carnegie, a local ironmaster, and his wife Catherine. She married Arthur Francis Hildreth in England in 1874 and moved to the Sydney suburb of Kogarah. Her husband, a successful architect, died in 1878, when Gertrude was pregnant with their first child, and she returned to England with her mother. She returned to Sydney in 1880, where she worked as a bank clerk. She was active in the Women's Loyal National League, an organization of conservative and middle class women which advocated the vote for all women, and helped found the Unitarian Woman's Suffrage Union. She was also active in the Sydney branch of the Women's Liberal Association, a political group founded by the radical New Zealand suffragist Lucy Bussell. Carnegie was an energetic and persuasive speaker. In 1884 she led a deputation to the Department of Justice to protest the imprisonment of feminist suffragist Caroline Chisholm. She was also active in the Women's Political Union and Women's Equal Franchise Association. Carnegie returned to England in 1886 to visit her dying mother. Her last years were clouded by depression, and she died in London in October 1887. She had several children, including William Carnegie Hildreth and Edmund Carnegie, who also became a well-known architect. DNA sequencing is, in principle, an easy procedure. However, the separation of individual DNA fragments is still tedious and laborious because of the lack of sufficiently fast and accurate methods for the detection of the bases of the chain molecules. The few devices for sequencing known are all restricted to a limited number of bases and complex detection systems. Here we report the design, assembly and demonstration of a simple and reliable DNA sequencing apparatus. The apparatus is based on an oligonucleotide microarray immobilized on a metalized glass surface. Such microarrays can be used for the enrichment of DNA fragments of any length and the detection of the bases in the resulting elongated oligonucleotide chain molecules using a dot-blot
