The judge who invalidated a key provision of the ACA, otherwise known as Obamacare, is President-Elect Donald Trump's choice for attorney general. U.S. District Judge Reed O'Connor, a George W. Bush appointee, ruled in late July that the entire law — popularly known as Obamacare — was unconstitutional. O'Connor's ruling has made the law invalid "in its entirety," but the ruling could take time to fully appeal, and it's unlikely to impact the implementation of the law. Trump has spoken publicly of wanting to "let Obamacare explode" as part of his promise to repeal and replace it. Trump's choice for attorney general, Alabama Sen. Jeff Sessions, has called the law "perhaps the greatest disappointment" of the presidency. He has said he doesn't favor a delay in its implementation, but said the law should remain optional. That, in essence, is what O'Connor ruled. "To say that the problem in the application of the individual mandate is confined to the failure to prove that the government in fact 'expects' certain people to have insurance and therefore has to require them to do so, is to trivialize the constitutional objection," O'Connor wrote in his ruling. "Nowhere in the statute does the government describe a prospective citizen of any age as one who is 'required' to hold insurance. The fines for failure to do so cannot be imposed on the basis of such a hypothetical, nonexistent entity." O'Connor's ruling impacts nearly every provision of the Affordable Care Act. He wrote that Obamacare's individual mandate, which requires Americans to buy health insurance or pay a tax penalty, "is an unconstitutional deprivation of liberty to the extent that it compels an individual to pay a tax or to violate an important moral command." The Affordable Care Act was signed into law in 2010 and mandated that everyone buy health insurance or face a fine. The fine varies depending on income. In 2013, the most recent year of available data, it was $95 or 1 percent of income, whichever 6d1f23a050
