Tool-assisted Caries Detection: An In Vitro Study of Fluorescence and Operational Definition. The aim of this study was to find out the suitability of fluorescence and choline spectra for detecting approximal caries lesions, with low probability of restoration failure. Sixty extracted human molars (60 restorations) were selected. They were divided into three groups of 20 caries lesions with different stages of progression. A CCD digital camera was used to make in vitro photographs. Half of them were randomly and blindly analyzed by three independent observers, in consensus, to find out the application of choline for detecting enamel caries, and half were quantitatively analyzed using two different methods. A significant agreement was observed in the detection of approximal caries (specificity and sensitivity), as well as in the use of fluorescence to detect approximal lesions and the analysis of choline spectrum (specificity and sensitivity). The use of choline spectrum could predict approximal lesions, enabling the characterization of the lesion depth and the risk of restoration failure. @ECHO OFF pushd %~dp0 REM Command file for Sphinx documentation if "%SPHINXBUILD%" == "" (set SPHINXBUILD=sphinx-build) set SOURCEDIR=. set BUILDDIR=. build if "%1" == "" goto help %SPHINXBUILD% >NUL 2>NUL if errorlevel 9009 (echo. echo.The'sphinx-build' command was not found.
