"We have a lot of people coming through and I will tell you, we're going to look at that whole region and we're going to see what happens," Mr. Trump said in a meeting with President Juan Orlando Hernandez of Honduras. Mr. Trump's comments stunned officials in Honduras and shook up the Mexican government, which is pressing the United States to stop asylum seekers in Mexico, where more than 50,000 migrants are currently kept in border city shelters and waiting for an opportunity to apply for asylum in the United States. The two Latin American nations are also considering creating a third safe third country for Central American migrants, on the condition that it be legally binding. Those talks have been moving slowly because the Trump administration has demanded that Mexico agree to take back Central Americans in the first instance, and that it take back those migrants without allowing them to seek asylum.Q: How to show error message if new user registered,after form submission in joomla I am developing web portal.
