when you first download the app, you will be able to see the main screen, which will help you to navigate the app and to find the features you are looking for. you can view the top four features of the app, which are the basic statistics, the basic statistics information, the basic statistics comparison, and the basic probability. the basic statistics feature is used to find information about users who are using the app. it is also used to find the total number of users who are using the app, and how many of those users are active. the basic statistics information feature is used to find statistics about the total number of users, the total number of daily users, the total number of weeks used, the total number of months used, and the total number of weeks used. the basic probability feature is used to find information about the total number of users who are active, and the total number of users who are inactive. the app is also used to find how many users are active, and how many users are inactive. as shown in fig. 1, a clear lactate peak was detected in the malignant cases of mucinous and serous adenocarcinoma at 1.23ppm. these results are supported by the previous study done by hascalik et al. (2005) who reported that lactate signal was detected in all malignant tumors as in mucinous and serous adenocarcinoma [19]. ammara et al. (2012) also reported that lactate peak was detected in both benign and malignant tumors, but the value detected in the malignant case was much higher than the value detected in any of the benign cases [15]. the detection of lactate peak in benign cases is less than the detection in malignant cases and the value detected in benign cases is lower than the value detected in malignant cases. this leads us to believe that the value detected in the malignant cases might be closer to the malignant case and the value detected in the benign cases might be closer to the benign case. in addition, the lactate peak in the serous adenocarcinoma was higher than the mucinous adenocarcinoma cases, which is supported by the previous study done by shahid et al. (2010) who reported that the lactate peak in the mucinous adenocarcinoma was lower than the serous adenocarcinoma [20].

The caloric requirement of fetal growth increases dramatically throughout pregnancy. US 2011 guidelines were recently published and provide lower targets for women and pregnant women with overweight and obesity. Routine engagement of the patient involves a description of how to position the woman throughout the fetal monitoring and the options for fetal monitoring. Patient education should include an expectation of the possibility of fetal compromise, including more caesarean section births, while the woman remains in labor. In the cesarean delivery, fetal monitoring and treatment should be performed prior to skin incision in the event of fetal compromise, while keeping a low threshold for immediate delivery of the neonate. Patients should be educated about the indications for expectant management of labor pain and be counseled about the safe use of analgesic/sedative medications. The patient should be informed that the duration of labor and the potential for spontaneous or induced labor augmentation may be prolonged by rupanadine. The patient should also be told that management of placental expulsion is not a substitute for progress of labor and may pose a risk of aspiration, and that in cases of C/S, babies should not be delivered without an intact perineum. Patients should be informed that if fetal testing is undertaken, a fall in blood pressure after fetal testing is not necessarily related to fetal compromise. Finally, patients should know that they have the right to refuse the procedure, but management of nausea and vomiting should be explained. Analgesia should be discussed with the patient before delivery and with her family. Drugs for analgesia should be assessed for cardiotoxic potential. In some cases, regional anaesthesia may be beneficial. Trained perinatal professional such as midwife and obstetrician in the combination of their scope of practice should be fully available and qualified to counsel and manage deliveries in the woman with asthma. Their functions include assessment and triage of the patient, to provide early management of preterm labor, to monitor fetal well-being, to provide adequate resuscitation, and to counsel patients and their families after delivery. Complementary and alternative medicine (CAM) are used by a substantial proportion of pregnant patients, often with no medical indication. In the absence of evidence that CAM is effective and without evidence to suggest that a risk exists, it is not recommended for use. In the current review, there was no significant association between the prevalence of asthma, self-reported use of CAM, and the prevalence of asthma symptoms in the controlled studies. The study conducted by the US National Center for Health Statistics (NCHS) defines CAM as "any intervention not generally considered part of conventional medicine" [25]. 5ec8ef588b
