The barriers faced by women who access methadone treatment represent a call for better services and improved training for those who provide it, both formal and informal. Warriner sees formal training for clinicians as a key to encouraging more women to seek methadone treatment, as well as more social services and medical outreach in the community. Women who use methadone need a range of professional care and support, and this includes guidance on how to cope with birth and infant care, postpartum recovery from heroin withdrawal, and child care. Clients need culturally sensitive, patient-centered care that can effectively address women's changing needs as they pursue recovery and re-enter their lives, she says. They need clinicians who are willing to listen, who understand the suffering of heroin addiction, and who work collaboratively with women, rather than imposing their professional views on them. Those who provide methadone to women need to be aware that relapse following the pregnancy is common and that substance abuse impacts mother and child in ways that may not be obvious to other health professionals. They also need to be willing to learn about the special needs of methadone-exposed babies and to take an active role in supporting parents to get the best possible care. Of course, many other aspects of the methadone treatment experience would deserve more attention, such as providers' lack of familiarity with methadone treatment and cultural factors that inhibit uptake. The needs of Latinos and immigrants also warrant further study. Maternity care professionals can provide support to women of all races, even though the majority of methadone-treated women are African Americans. Those who care for methadone-exposed infants can learn about the special needs of this population and the need for universal newborn screening. That said, methadone treatment programs can play an important role in prenatal and early postnatal care of pregnant women, as well as in support of women in the treatment process.

Some substance-using mothers encounter significant roadblocks in pursuing prenatal care because they believe that prenatal care is the first step toward losing custody of their children. They understand that health care providers, such as CPS caseworkers and medical personnel, are involved in the custody and kinship determination process and fear that their drug use and/or risky sexual behavior will be discovered. These mothers cannot change their beliefs and behaviors until they feel safe enough to disclose their substance use to medical professionals. While substance-using mothers can seek prenatal care, they must monitor their use if they are pregnant because prenatal care may be the only opportunity they have to disclose their use to medical professionals and law enforcement authorities before their children are born. The fifth annual results of the MESA study continue to reveal an early adulthood cohort that is demonstrating the persistence of health and substance use problems, which are likely to continue to reach a critical mass over time. As the full-study sample continues to grow in size and experience, we will be able to more fully evaluate the differences between cohort members who continued using illicit drugs from those who ceased or reduced their substance use between baseline and the most recent follow-up. It is clear that there are many positive changes among MESA members. Participants continue to experience a reduction in their drug and alcohol use, and these reductions have been pronounced in recent years. Among MESA cohort members, we have observed a substantial decline in the proportion who reported having at least one alcohol use problem and for marijuana and prescription opioid use problems. MESA members continue to experience a decrease in the number of days of heavy drinking and in the number of heavy drinking days per month. Similarly, other drug use problems have declined, including the use of heroin, cocaine, inhalants, and over-the-counter medications. 5ec8ef588b
